In structural engineering, a truss is a triangular design and a joint framed structure that sustains the inclination, vertical, or horizontal loads. A truss consists of angles, channels, and eye bars. It typically consists of rafters, posts, and struts, supporting a roof or a bridge or any other structure. They are used to support the roofs of cinema halls, stadiums, railways, stations, airports, and other industrial and residential buildings. Roof trusses are characterized by the economical use of construction materials. Roof truss is composed of individual lightweight pieces; a truss can also provide a considerable advantage in transport and assembly as compared to conventional roof structures.
