Agriculture faces a number of challenges in the twenty-first century, including the need to produce more food to feed a growing population with a shrinking rural labour force, more

Reports And Data

feedstocks for a potentially huge bioenergy market, contributing to overall development in many agriculture-dependent developing countries, adopting more efficient and sustainable production methods, and adapting to changing environmental conditions. The world's population is expected to grow by more than a third, or 2.3 billion people, between 2009 and 2050. Nearly all of this expansion is predicted to come from poorer countries.

At the same time, by 2050, per capita wages are predicted to be several times higher than they are now. Analysts agree that recent trends of developing economies rising at a higher rate than developed economies will continue in the future. Agriculture has an impact on many areas of the economy, both locally and globally. Agriculture business trends will influence the future of many other industries, including farmers, real estate, supermarkets, and restaurants. These factors will have an impact on food production and distribution as well.
