EINPresswire.com/ -- Until recently, the perception has been that fine art assets were reserved for high-net-worth individuals, However, At Simon Rieber's art, his goal is to create accessibility of fine art to smaller retail buyers, collectors and even the fledging art buyer.

People all over the world, whether rich or poor have appreciated art from the very beginning of time. Every country has an abundance of artists creating different works which can be appreciated worldwide.

From painters, photographers, sculptors, calligraphers, illustrators, printmakers, and graphic designers, many producing art as a hobby, to fulfil their artistic needs to create and wanting to display their passion with the world. Some art can bring joy, stop you in your tracks and inspire you to feel positive about everything beautiful in the world, others may stimulate feelings of despair or sorrow, some make us question our ethical responsibilities whilst others can bring current events to light and be seen as activist art.

Simon Rieber has always had a passion for art. Coming from a distinguished family of collectors, he began his career at a young age working in a local gallery.

He has developed a tremendous amount of knowledge on the art industry, allowing him to build a large team of art enthusiasts and market analysts who aid him in researching undervalued artwork, allowing him to support local artists and build original collections for his clients.

Not only should art be purchased by everyone that appreciates it, but art should also be seen as an investment, but like any good investment it does require some time and knowledge, and in today's rapidly changing economic environment, it can be difficult to identify opportunities to buy or sell art, but to Simon Rieber, you will have access to our team of consultants, who will update you on the market changes, give honest opinions on trends and art valuations based on the current market.
