PORTLAND, UNITED STATES, November

29, 2021 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The driving factors of the global protein purification and isolation market are the growing need to identify new protein-based drug molecules, increased research in the pharmaceutical and biotechnological fields, and rising demand for rapid purification kits to rapidly screen, prepare, purify, and concentrate protein samples. In addition, various factors, such as increased funding from both public and private research bodies for research & development and growing research in the field of structure-based drug design complement the growth of the market.

However, high cost of purification instruments and lack of skilled professionals are factors hindering the growth of the market. Increasing need to identify new ligands for the drug discovery process and demand for protein therapeutics create opportunities in the market.

Protein purification is the process of isolating proteins from the complex mixtures of cells, tissues, or organisms based on differences in their physical properties. The protein purification process aims to isolate the huge amount of functional protein with least contaminants. The process isolates proteins and non-protein parts in the mixture to separate desired protein. It is beneficial for the characterization of the function, determining structure, and interactions of the protein to be studied. Technological innovations create new pathways in the protein purification and isolation technologies.
