Key Developments in the Global Grain Dryer Industry

Starting in 2017, the Propane Education & Research Council, with the help of three different agricultural companies, developed a series of new fuel-efficient grain drying technologies.

These technologies are aimed at helping farmers save money, enhancing their productivity and help fulfil food shortages arising due to incomplete production quota.

The investment involved an R&D project, for the development of GSI's heat reclamation system, the redesigned Legacy Series grain dryers by Mathews Company, and the new burner design by Sukup Manufacturing Co.

As part of the new technology development and testing process, PERC provided industry expertise and financial support.

The PERC and Mathews Company collaborated to reduce energy consumption through innovation. Its profile-style Legacy Series products were completely redesigned to include a new fan, burner, and control system to its product line.

PERC and Sukuup partnered to redesign a grain dryer burner to increase energy efficiency.

Using the Octagon Burner, which is a new and highly efficient method of drying grain, uses less propane to achieve a higher temperature rise. This reduces CO2 emissions and increases fuel savings.
