Overview:

Alcohol swabs are gauze swabs that are saturated with 70% isopropyl alcohol and are used to disinfect cuts, scrapes, and intact skin. It is an important part of any first aid kit. Thus, there are widely used in diagnostic centers, doctors' clinics, and other facilities where easy and quick cleaning of a place is desired. These swabs help the affected area to get rid of potential sources of contamination. Moreover, these swabs are used by nurses and phlebotomists to clean the wound, remove pus, to clean the spot before giving an injection, or for any related procedures.

Diabetic alcohol swabs are often used to measure blood glucose levels in people with diabetes. A study published in 2011 in the journal Diabetes Care showed that a failure to wash a patient's hands with water or clean the fingers with an alcohol swab before pricking the finger can affect glucose readings. The fingers are usually cleaned with an alcohol swab before the blood sample is taken to ensure that the test site is clean and there no contaminants. Due to weak and unstable immune system, diabetics are more prone to infections, skin disorders, and diseases.

Diabetic Alcohol Swabs

Increasing prevalence of diabetes around the world is expected to boost growth of the global diabetic alcohol swabs market. For instance, according to the International Diabetic Federation (IDF), in 2015, over 415 million individuals suffered from diabetes, and the number is expected to reach around 642 million by 2040. Furthermore, as per the American Diabetic Association (ADA), more than 29.1 million Americans, or around 9.3% of the US population, suffered from diabetes in 2012. Testing of blood glucose levels is mandatory for the diagnosis of diabetes, in which alcohol swabs finds its use. Thus, with the increasing prevalence of diabetes, the demand for diabetic alcohol swabs is also increasing with a rapid pace.
