The use of unmanned aerial vehicles speeds up the delivery procedure while simultaneously reducing the risk of exposure to medical personnel. Apart from hospitals, these unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) are also utilised to deliver important items to clients in remote places, saving time over traditional transportation methods. For example, in March 2020, in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, the United Kingdom government initiated a fast-track trial employing drones to carry medications from the British mainland to the Isle of Wight. The market is growing as a result of such public and private sector activities. Aside from these, drone delivery services have a number of advantages, including low-cost operations, faster package delivery, reduced human resource utilisation, time savings, and so on.
