The Washington Post pieced together an extensive breakdown of President Biden's historic Build Back Better plan in a recent article that adding that it marks the second legislative milestone for Democrats in November — the previous win was a bill to improve roads and bridges, internet connections, and infrastructure investments. The key piece to the Build Back Better plan, especially for those

Rick Thornton, a Frisco health insurance agent, said Democrats relied on a mix of measures that targeted wealthy Americans and profitable corporations to help pay for the package. This slightly alleviated concerns from opposing lawmakers, though there will undoubtedly still be discussion on the plan's long-term viability. "Members of Congress have stood exactly where we stand to pass legislation of extraordinary consequence in our nation's history and for our nation's future," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said in a speech shortly before the vote. "With the passage of the Build Back Better Act, we, this Democratic Congress, are taking our place in the long and honorable heritage of our democracy with legislation that will be the pillar of health and financial security in America."
