Many athletes have come forward recently to state they have or will be converting all or some of their pay, signing bonuses or other income into cryptocurrencies, but all have been males. This is not lost on Danielle as she prepares to re-enter the ring as Summer Rae.

As more professional athletes are starting to get paid in crypto I think it's important for female athletes to as well. I am excited to be at the forefront of that movement!"

Danielle Moinet (Summer Rae), WWE Superstar

"Going back to wrestle in the WWE's Royal Rumble PPV is very special for me as there have only ever been 4 Women's Royal Rumble matches. I used to watch it growing up every year & imagine my name on the big screen though it was only men on my tv screen." mentions Danielle. "I am excited to be converting some of my pay from the PPV into crypto with Hedge. As more professional athletes are starting to get paid in crypto I think it's important for female athletes to as well. I am excited to be at the forefront of that movement!"

David Schwartz, the CEO of Cornerstone Global Management, Inc. also agrees its time for female athletes to be able to take center stage and be recognized within the cryptocurrency space.

"I'm very excited for Danielle. She's getting to go back into the ring, which is something she's wanted to do for a bit now, and also putting her money where her mouth by actually converting some of her pay into crypto. It's a watershed moment for female athletes to be included in the crypto space, and I'm proud she's the one who is able to usher that in."

Hedge is built to scale so employees, independent contractors, etc. can seamlessly convert a customizable portion of their compensation into crypto and securely deposit it into their individual wallets, or leave it directly on Hedge. Hedge's platform allows a person's pay to still be sent out in government backed money like the dollar from employer/payer to employee/payee, so neither side incurs a separate taxable event at the original point of pay.
