"Crypto is complicated to most people. As a result, they count on friends, family members, and crypto influencers to think for them when it comes to their portfolio allocations," said Kevin van Dorp, co-founder and chief marketing officer of CoinScouts. "Our goal is to empower traders by simplifying things for them. With our unique search filters, they can easily scout for tokens and do their own research. We also wish to include these traders in the development of our platform. Current databases rely on their own administrative staff to keep up with the incredibly fast changing crypto market. We believe that a community of millions will be better equipped to keep a database up to date."

CoinScouts has recently upgraded its website's design to improve user experience. Changes included adding additional filters for both novice and experienced traders, informative filter descriptions, coin metrics, and up-to-date posts on its press and event pages. Members of the community can now add and edit listed coins, as well as add project descriptions. When the platform is fully operational, CoinScouts plans to financially compensate members for their contributions.

The current crypto database landscape is dominated by CoinMarketCap and CoinGecko, which receive over 120 million monthly visits each. CoinScouts aims to diversify the landscape with its unique proposition. The website is still focused on English-speaking countries, but there are plans to customize and expand the website to other countries and regions around the world.
