During his tenure as COO of Gray, Gray & Gray, Wolfson has championed the use of technological advances to streamline internal processes and create efficiencies for the firm and its clients. "Few people know that, in the 1950s, Gray, Gray & Gray was one of first accounting firms in the U.S. to use computers to file taxes," says Wolfson. "We have always been on the cutting edge of technology and continue to be so today."

Wolfson has also focused the firm's resources on enriching the work environment at Gray, Gray & Gray through "investment in human capital." By embracing such processes as improving internal channels of communication, investing in staff training and wellness, and expanding Gray Academy, the firm's internal leadership development program, Wolfson believes that the firm is actively demonstrating that, "We want our team members to be happy, fulfilled and successful."

Prior to joining Gray, Gray & Gray, Wolfson served in senior operations management positions in the construction, architecture, accounting and food distribution industries. Hank Wolfson is a resident of Norwell, MA, and a graduate of the University of Massachusetts-Dartmouth.
