To join such a prestigious group is humbling to all of us. Together, we're building something that's unique and this latest accolade truly makes all of us feel 'above the clouds.'”

Duane Horton, President and CEO of McLemore

The Old Course at St. Andrews was built in 1873 providing the foundation for the legendary history of the game and for courses around the world. Over the years, courses on the list were built from 1903 to 2010 with McLemore being the newest course, opening in 2019. McLemore's design by golf architects Rees Jones and Bill Bergin not only pays respect to the game of golf but also to the history and reverence they have for the area.

McLemore's Executive Vice President Charlie Rymer, PGA said, "The McLemore experience is one that is drawing golfers to the area as a 'must play' or 'bucket list' course. And with the most recent accolades these golfers will be coming from near and far. We believe McLemore provides one of the most stunning golf course vistas in the world and we're pleased to share it with members, guests and friends."

McLemore President and CEO Duane Horton said, "To join such a prestigious group is truly humbling to all of us. We are proud of the work done by course designers Rees Jones and Bill Bergin as well as the landscape architectural team at Hart-Howerton led by Roland Aberg. Together, we're building something that's truly unique and this latest accolade truly makes all of us feel 'above the clouds'."
