Gasket is a mechanical screen that fills the space between two or more pairing surfaces. It is used to avoid leakage when compressed from the joined objects. It is usually produced by cutting from sheet materials. Gaskets usually consist of flaky materials, including rubber, foil, silicone, cork, felt, metal, fiberglass, and other nitrile rubber. It is widely used in the automotive, aerospace, electrical, food, petrochemical, marine, pharmaceutical, pumping, rail, petroleum, and gas and water sectors. Soft gasket, spiral wound gasket, ring joint gasket, corrugated joints, and jacket joints are numerous types of industrial gaskets. It is used to prevent leakage. Multiple manufacturers' industrial dip gaskets are compatible and can be metallic or semimetallic with certain international laws. In addition to other sealing solutions, industrial gaskets take a pivotal position in different parts of the world in Maintenance, Repair, and Operating (MRO) applications.
