Medical Device Packaging provides protection as well as ensures sterility of the medical devices during the shelf life. The critical need of maintaining the sterile barrier system (SBS) is a distinguishing feature of medical device packaging. It functions as a barrier to keep microorganisms out of the product and safeguard the medical devices from contamination, physical damage, and any kind of mechanical damage during shipping and storage. Medical device packaging also performs advertising and communication functions. The packaging conveys information regarding the product such as warnings, directions, and benefits. Product identification is a critical part of package communication. This is especially true for medical devices that are used in institutional settings, such as hospitals, where personnel may be pressed for time to select the suitable device for a patient.
