-- The latest market research report by Reports and Data is titled 'Global Food Waste Reduction Market – Forecast to 2028.' The report offers holistic understanding of the global Food Waste Reduction market and explains several growth-influencing factors such as drivers, opportunities, restraints, and challenges. The key contents of the report are the List of Tables and Figures, Research Methodology, Market Description, Market Dynamics, Regional Outlook, Company Profiles, Competitive Landscape, Technological Innovations, and Strategic Market Developments. The report serves as a concise summary of the Food Waste Reduction market and offers a glimpse of the current market scenario with regard to the COVID-19 impact.

Food waste can be defined as total losses and waste throughout the food supply chain such as production, postharvest, processing, distribution, and consumption. Globally, approximately 14% of food produced is lost from harvest to retail, with an estimated 17% of total global food production wasted. Food wastage is a threat to the long-term viability of our food systems. Food waste reduction is helpful to the environment since it keeps food out of landfills. It makes financial sense on a small scale, because it lowers household food prices, and on a large scale, it lowers disposal costs for restaurants, processors, and farmers. Eventually, reducing food waste is socially significant since the saved food can be diverted to emergency food providers to eliminate hunger.
