Drivers & Trends

The global crude oil crisis has prompted big corporations to work on improving their storage and distribution capacity in order to reduce their losses. In such instances, storage tanks play an important role in meeting rising consumer demand while also conserving stocks for future needs. Furthermore, rigorous environmental restrictions enforced by various governments and environmental agencies throughout the world have pushed the use of vapour recovery units in the crude oil business in order to reduce environmental effect. According to the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers (CAPP), Western Oil produced 3.7 million barrels of crude oil per day in 2015. Key firms in Canada are concentrating on the adoption of VPUs in order to increase storage capacity. TransCanada also intended to increase capacity by 2.6 million barrels by the end of 2016.
