Utility poles are widely utilized for transmitting and distributing electricity from power stations to end users. Commonly equipped with insulators, cutouts, cross arms, lightning arrestors, and transformers, they are made by using wood, steel and concrete. Also known as electric power poles, they support a vast array of wires, including primary, neutral, secondary, ground, and telephone and cable.

The global market is majorly driven by considerable growth in the telecommunication industry due to the rising consumption of electricity across the globe. Moreover, due to an enhanced focus on sustainable development, end users are preferring the usage of steel electric poles as they aid in minimizing greenhouse gas emissions. Apart from this, the growing preference for concrete utility poles that are manufactured using ultra-high strength and pre-stressed spun concrete is also creating a positive outlook for the market. Their usage assists in improving the durability, static performance and security of the poles, thereby gaining widespread prominence across the globe.
