considered based on their revenue size, product portfolio, market share, key marketing stratagems, and overall contribution to the market growth.

The development of green roofing technologies and rising expenses of air conditioning and heating systems are driving the international market for commercial and residential roofing. Because roofing is used in a variety of industries besides commercial and residential, the global market is expected to become strong as construction activities increase. The construction industry is a significant end-user of roofing materials. The growing population base in emerging economies such as Saudi Arabia, China, Costa Rica, and Egypt have built a solid platform for market expansion.

The global commercial and residential roofing industry offers a wide range of roof coatings, including thermal polyolefin (TPO), polyvinyl chloride (PVC), modified bitumen, and ethylene propylene diene monomer (EPDM). The global market can be split into polymer, polymer modified, reflective, and bituminous depending on the type of product. The high cost of innovation and installation of roofing systems is predicted to slow the growth of the international commercial and residential sector. However, advancements in roofing material technology, such as solar roofing systems, are expected to generate lucrative prospects in the global market.
