Affordable Housing for Older Adults: Developer-Provider Partnerships is a roadmap for non-profit and for-profit housing developers building affordable housing for older adults.

An established nonprofit developer and social service provider, Selfhelp Community Services offers its expertise in addressing the housing crisis and provides the essentials both non-profit and for-profit developers need to create effective partnerships to build new buildings. The paper takes the reader through all stages of building development, and provides real examples of strong partnerships between government agencies, lenders, and investors, resulting in more affordable housing for low-income older adults.

"For decades, Selfhelp has been building affordable housing and offering services through its recognized service model, SHASAM (Selfhelp Active Services for Aging Model). Community is at the heart of all housing, and our new paper shares our experience creating partnerships that build vibrant and healthy communities for older adults," said Stuart Kaplan, CEO, Selfhelp Community Services

"Selfhelp is proud to be on the forefront of developing affordable housing and providing evidence-based social services that benefit the health and quality of life of residents. It's important for all affordable housing developers in New York to understand how to partner with social service providers for the lifelong wellbeing of their residents." said Brian Steinwurtzel, Co-CEO and Principal, GFP, and Chair, Selfhelp Realty Group
