analysis, and contemporary advancements in the global market. The global automotive camshaft market reached a value of US$ 3.07 Billion in 2020. Looking forward, the global automotive camshaft market is expected to exhibit moderate growth during 2021-2026. An automotive camshaft is a rod-like structure which forms a key component of internal combustion engines (ICE). It controls the input of fuel and the ejection of exhaust fumes in the engine by controlling the inlet and outlet valves. This process is critical for the functioning of the engine and can have a significant impact on its performance and speed. The camshaft is driven by the crankshaft and can be connected to it through a gear, a timing belt or directly. It is generally made up of cast iron and nitride or heat-treated steel and can be hollow to reduce the weight of the engine.
