Additionally, the elevating environmental concerns and the rising awareness about the risks associated with chemical surfactants are further propelling the market growth. Besides this, as various biosurfactants have strong antibacterial, antifungal, and antiviral properties, they are gaining traction in the pharmaceutical industry, which is also catalyzing the market growth. Furthermore, the shifting consumer inclination towards organic and natural cosmetic products is bolstering the popularity of biosurfactants as foaming agents and cleansers in bathing products, lipsticks, mascara, etc. Apart from this, the escalating demand for packaged food products and the increasing oil and gas exploration activities across countries are expected to fuel the biosurfactants market in the coming years.
