Overview

A softgel capsule is a drug delivery system in which the active ingredients are in suspension within an oily or aqueous medium. The two main types of capsules are derived from aqueous solutions containing gelling agents. These agents are either animal proteins such as gelatin or polysaccharides such as starch or cellulose modifications. These agents are used to increase the absorption of the medication and to make the softgels easier to swallow. The manufacturing process of the softgel capsule is very complex and can pose a number of challenges. Expertise in the field, knowledge of machinery and the filling material are required to meet all these challenges. Moreover, high quality gelatin is necessary for successful capsule production.
