Household induction cook-tops require special magnetic cookware that is costlier than conventional plastic or porcelain cookware. Thus, the high cost of household induction cook-tops due to the need for ferromagnetic material cookware is expected to restrict their adoption to some extent in developing regions like Africa, thereby hindering the market growth. Adoption of induction cooktops owing to their convenience, and enhanced aesthetic appeal is driving their demand across the globe. Also, low carbon emission by induction cooktops as compared to conventional gas cooktops has facilitated market growth in the last few years. Moreover, the ability of induction cooktops to quickly control and change the temperature and heat for precision cooking is triggering its demand among food enthusiasts.
