On Wednesday, March 16th, Fran Brunelle, host on The WAM Podcast, discusses the Fashion Industry with Samantha Tollworthy. With 100 billion items produced every year, it's no surprise that the fashion industry is known as the second most polluting industry on the planet. From the crops grown and processed to the dyeing and transportation involved, Samantha Tollworthy — founder of USA-made sock company Teddy Locks — is working to reduce that fashion footprint by building a fully sustainable, high-quality hosiery brand. Samantha talks about why she left her dream job to chase her passion for sustainability, and why she chooses to work directly with the supply chain, running her entire company from North Carolina. Fran and Samantha also touch on the delicate balance between motherhood and brand ownership, especially when Samantha's daughter and sock brand were born around the same time and at the start of the Covid-19 pandemic.

Before Teddy Locks, Samantha was a Marine Biologist and Wildlife TV Producer. Her motivation in founding the Green America certified sock brand was to help fight climate change and the war on waste. Building Teddy Locks literally from the fiber up, Samantha and the brand have now recycled more than 14,000 plastic bottles by turning them into luxuriously soft socks. On Friday, March 18th, Mike Kotzian, Managing Director of Kivnon USA shares the latest developments in Autonomous Guided Vehicles for factory floors, warehouses, and distribution centers to handle materials from storage to production lines to inventory with a small footprint to expand the utility of AGVs for specialized load handling.
