In the world of dentistry, the need for devices that can help discretely and effectively treat alignment issues, such as crooked teeth, have always been popular. Alignment problems can develop at any stage of life and, for some people, traditional braces aren't going to suit their needs. For many, they simply aren't subtle enough. Clear aligners, like those from Beam, can help people straighten their teeth but without worrying about the appearance of traditional braces.

Beam Clear Aligners are sold not just through a range of partnered dentists and orthodontists throughout Australia, but also directly online through the website. Customers are able to visit the website to take a 30-second online assessment, after which they can see a personalised 3D treatment plan that explains how their aligners will help them. From there, they can purchase an impression kit that is then sent back to the team at Beam to create the aligners necessary. After that, the customer wears several aligners, each of them helping to further correct their alignment over a set period of time.

One of the benefits of Beam Clear Aligners that have helped them become so popular is the fact that they can allow people to receive dentist-direct teeth straightening treatments without the need for any in-person appointments. There are still licensed dental professionals on the other end of the process, making sure that the aligners are being designed to be used as effectively as possible, just on the other end of the screen.

As a result of the extra convenience afforded by their online purchasing process, and the growing need for alignment treatment options that are more discreet, Beam Clear Aligners have been able to make a million dollars in their first year and anticipate further growth as their services spread far and wide.
