Industry Trends

Ceria-zirconia is a combination of cerium oxide (CeO₂) and zirconium oxide (ZrO₂). The product is being increasingly used in the reduction of hydrocarbons, and for applications such as photocatalysis, and electronics manufacturing. The rising demand amongst companies for highly purified ceria-zirconia products, coupled with the rise in focus on reducing the impact of hydrocarbons on the environment using three-way catalysis is driving the growth of the global ceria-zirconia market.

COVID-19 Impact:

2020 saw the rapid spread of the coronavirus, and the pandemic has caused disruption in the supply chain across industries. The ceria-zirconia producers faced difficulties as a result of the decrease in revenue flow globally, and the shortage in staffing due to the social distancing and lockdown norms imposed by government bodies across the globe. Ceria-zirconia is mainly transported through the marine route, and stricter regulations associated with import and export during the pandemic created concerns amongst the market participants. However, the pandemic has generated additional opportunities for the market participants in the global ceria-zirconia market, especially in electronics manufacturing and medical device manufacturing (mainly implants). NANOKER, for instance, is providing ceria-stabilized zirconia nanocomposite materials for the production of dental implants. The market is expected to see growth in revenue in the coming years, as the pandemic situation is getting under control and business operations are going back to the pre-pandemic setting.
