At a young age he decides to suspend his studies to devote himself to learning the family trade, which from generation to generation had been handed down from father to son.

After working for years in the family tailor's shop, and seeing that the textile market was changing due to the imminent arrival of the economic crisis, out of passion, he decides to make his art available to the sport of boxing, with the intention of making a product of luxury and excellence in a sector and a sport considered marginal, as it is only practiced by poor people and
