256.7 Million in 2020 and is projected to grow at a CAGR of 3.2% from 2020, to reach a value of USD 324.9 Million by 2028. Bovine serum albumin has several biochemical applications, including ELISAS (enzyme-linked Immunosorbent Assay), immunoblots, and immunohistochemistry. Because bovine serum albumin could be a small, stable, moderately non-reactive protein, it's often used as a blocker in immunohistochemistry. During immunohistochemistry, this is the process that uses antibodies to detect antigens in cells, tissue sections is usually produced with bovine serum albumin blockers to bind nonspecific binding sites. The BSA blocker improves sensitivity by minimizing background signal because the sites are covered with the moderately non-reactive protein. Bovine serum albumin is employed to stabilize some enzymes during the digestion of DNA and to forestall adhesion of the enzyme to reaction tubes, pipette tips, and other vessels.

The bovine albumin market is driven by the increasing use of plasma products within the food industry, advances in bovine blood collection and processing, and increased demand for animal meat and animal protein among the human population. Other drivers of the bovine albumin market include widening the scope of animal by-products in cell culture technology, increased demand for bovine serum albumin as an excipient within the pharmaceutical industry, and improvement within the supply chain and distribution network within the global bovine albumin market. Major restraints of the market are a rise in bovine diseases leading to reduced production and an increase in preference for alternative products.
