Highlighting his transition from real estate investment into the equity and cryptocurrency scenes, Antonio Velardo revealed that the main factor that influenced his decision to invest or not invest in a particular company was the leadership behind the company and the extent to which they were motivated for success.

“Most times, understanding what motivates the founder and his team is more important than understanding the project itself. Especially in pre-seed investment rounds where companies simply present pitch decks, which are more or less PowerPoint presentations filled with lofty promises. The ability to understand the drive of the founder and how reliable he/she can be under pressure is an investor's most prized asset.”

Speaking further on venture capitalist investments, Antonio posited that it was always better to bank on projects with huge rewards. According to him, there's always the possibility of losing everything invested if the business fails and so investors must ensure they only back viable projects with huge returns and even bigger growth potential.

The serial investor also highlighted his journey into the cryptocurrency world and expressed some strong opinions on the future of bitcoin and Ethereum.
