and working in New York City between the years of 2007 and 2015. "For the better part of a decade, I would travel south to photograph my hometown of Hopewell, Virginia," said Lamb. "I would wake up early and walk through the streets - revisiting the places I had known and the person I was when I knew them. The city seemed to stand still. It held its breath and I held mine.

No longer declining and not quite moving forward. The heartbeat of the community could be found – faintly, ever so faintly - plugging along in the summer heat."

Responding to this feeling, Lamb moved back home to Virginia in 2016 to test the theory that art can transform a community.

That year, she opened the Lamb Center for Arts and Healing, which now serves over 6,000 people a year. Lamb Arts is a multi-faceted project which includes programs for Creative Change Makers in the local high schools, a Creative Aging Program for senior citizens, training, and support for art teachers in the local public schools, an annual Hopewell Arts Fest, and a Pop-Up Program of free one-time art experiences that "pop-up" throughout the area multiple times a year.

ABOUT HOPEWELL, VIRGINIA

Hopewell is a quaint city of 23,000 about 20 miles south or Virginia's capital at Richmond. Located at the confluence of the James and Appomattox Rivers, Hopewell's historic section of City Point was one of North America's oldest English-speaking communities. In the 18th century, Hopewell became a significant port city and in World War I it became a boomtown with the production of guncotton in the local DuPont plant. During the war, the city's population rose from 200 residents to more than 30,000. The DuPont plant was closed after the war and the city's population fell. In 1915 a fire destroyed 300 buildings in Hopewell, but the city quickly rebuilt. Other manufacturing plants moved into Hopewell, including Evonik (formerly Goldschmidt Chemical) In the early 1970s. The city has been investing in environmental controls and is now in the middle of a renaissance. There are new businesses, new restaurants and new and exciting projects, including Dr. Lamb's Center for the Arts & Healing.
