Pyrethrin is a naturally-occurring pesticide found in Chrysanthemum cinerariifolium. It contains six chemicals that are toxic to the nervous systems of insects. The compound is often considered an organic insecticide and is typically used as an insect-repellant against ants, fleas, flies, mosquitoes, and moths, among other pests. It is usually separated from the flowers and contains certain impurities. It has been in use as a pesticide since the past several decades, and has also been used as models to formulate longer lasting chemicals known as pyrethroids. Pyrethrins have gradually replaced organochlorides and organophosphates as the preferred pesticides as they have been shown to have superior and persistent toxic effects on humans. Owing to their biodegradable nature, they are also preferred over pyrethroids, which are synthetic analogues of pyrethrin found in nature. They are less harmful to humans as compared to conventional pesticides.
