Covid-19 Impact Overview:

The COVID-19 pandemic has adversely affected the demand for fish in India. The restrictions on trade and travel, along with import and export activities, have negatively impacted the market. Furthermore, the closure of restaurants and hotels has led to the declining sales of fish across the country. However, with the reducing number of active COVID-19 cases and the high vaccination rates in India, the restrictions are gradually being lifted. Along with this, the widespread preference for online contactless food delivery among the masses is currently creating a positive outlook for the market.

Market Trends:

The market in India is majorly driven by the widespread preference for protein-rich diets among the masses. Furthermore, the increasing health awareness regarding fish consumption is providing an impetus to the market growth. Due to the hectic schedules led by the working professionals, there has been a rising demand for frozen and canned foods, which is catalyzing the product sales across the country. Apart from this, the rapid expansion of the organized food retail sector is propelling the market growth further. Besides this, an increase in aquaculture production and various favorable practices adopted by the fishermen to boost the production are favorably impacting the market. Moreover, the government of India is undertaking several initiatives to promote the cultivation of targeted commercial fishes in ponds and inland water bodies, which is anticipated to contribute to the market.
