The automotive crankshaft market consists of the sales of automotive crankshafts by entities (organizations, partnerships, and sole proprietors) that transform the force generated by combustion into circular motion in the engine required to propel a vehicle. The crankshaft is a heavy-duty component located at the engine's bottom and is typically constructed of steel or iron. It is connected to the pistons' bases through connecting rods that attach to crank pins at zig-zag offsets from the crankshaft's centerline. This arrangement allows the pistons' vertical movement to spin the crankshaft and generate rotational energy.
