Competitive Landscape

The global market for application transformation is characterized by the presence of multiple vendors, aiming to offer extensive consulting and integration services to clients. Additionally, enterprises are seeking out specialized service providers, offering solutions tailor-made to suit their business objectives. In addition, the vendors are likely to leverage upgradation and product differentiation to gain an edge over other competitors in the market.

In April 2022, Fujitsu Limited introduced its Fujitsu Computing as a Service (CaaS) portfolio. This service will accelerate digital transformation and empower customers globally by offering access to some of the world's most advanced computing technologies via the cloud for commercial use. This encompasses Fujitsu's Digital Annealer quantum technology and software applications to solve AI and ML issues
In December 2021, Cognizant acquired Devbridge, a privately owned software consultancy and product development company in Chicago. The acquisition expanded Cognizant's software product engineering capabilities and global delivery footprint by adding over 600 engineers, designers and product managers across multiple countries

Atos has announced recently in April 2022 that it intends to forge a 5-year contractual agreement to deliver managed services for digital operations, applications and cybersecurity for Independent Health (IH). Atos' operational solutions will leverage infrastructure and digital platforms to optimize operating costs and generate efficiencies across the business landscape. Overall, the application transformation landscape is poised to yield an absolute dollar opportunity worth US$ 21.5 Billion until 2032. Sales of application integration services will continue to flourish, with a documented CAGR of 11.5% from 2015-2021. Moreover, large enterprises will continue to remain the primary beneficiaries of application transformation services, likely to register a CAGR worth 9.6% from 2022 to 2032. North America will remain at the forefront, generating an opportunity worth US$ 7.4 Billion during the forecast period.
