In addition to her role in setting New Jersey on the path to legalizing cannabis with focus on social justice, evidence of her successful work is evidenced by the restoration of voting rights for people on probation and parole, the law requiring the state's attorney general to investigate police-involved deaths, and the establishment of Fair and Welcoming policies in local towns and State government.

"It's exciting that we are able to provide a platform for our audience to be able to learn from the New Jersey Cannabis Regulatory Commission about the latest in regulations," said Jen Wynn, vice president of expositions for BusinessExpos.com. "I'm sure it will be a full room."
