NEW DELHI, NEW DELHI, INDIA, June 8, 2022 /EINPresswire.com/ -- COVID-19 might have accelerated processes that have started already, and we might never return to the world we lived in before 2020. Kachins Studio been photographing weddings for years, and learned that a percentage of couples wanted a large wedding only because it was what their parents wished for and often paid for. Those couples would probably decide to elope under other circumstances.

Weddings as social rituals are steeped in traditions that are hundreds of years old. There has always been something nostalgic about them which doesn't seem to fit our modern-day lives. Think oversized ball gown skirts, processional at the ceremony, tiered cakes and excessive spending on décor, food, entertainment... Over the past decades, trends have moved in the direction of personalization of weddings, establishing new customs and making weddings more intimate. One of the new traditions is the “first look” photo session of the couple before the ceremony. We no longer believe in old superstitions such as the one which says the groom must not see the bride before the wedding day because it is bad luck. Everything has been modernized from the cake and flowers to guest lists, seating plans, sendoffs and honeymoons. Today, anything goes, and massive family gatherings are no longer a norm just like the white dress and a tiered fruitcake.

Contemporary weddings have already been stripped of many traditions before COVID-19. After one, two or maybe even three years of living the new normality with the virus, traditional gatherings with hundreds of guests might become ancient history.

It is up to us to decide whether we are going to take this opportunity to distance from each other and lead even more digital lives or turn back to the old values and be social animals – organic and natural human beings.

Just like weddings themselves, wedding photography won't cease to exist, but its future largely depends on our choice of the path after the pandemic. Perhaps weddings and big holidays are the only occasions that used to bring us all together, and now we are in danger of losing that too.

Now Pre-Weddings and Wedding Celebrations in India have started the way it is used to before covid pandemic. To keep that in mind and future business prospects and with professional approach towards wedding photography, Kachins Studio have re energised and have altered their wedding packages so that it suits to most of the families in India. Since Kachins Studio is based out of Delhi and have largest number of wedding photographers network across India.
