The preference for wearable and portable medical devices is increasing and companies are developing wearable respiratory devices to improve patient monitoring to drive the anesthesia and respiratory devices market growth. Wearable respiratory devices are mainly worn on the torso and are used to calculate the patient's breathing rate by measuring movements of the chest wall. They are available in various forms such as small dimensional sensors, belts, and band-aid-like devices. These devices are usually connected to specialty smartphone apps that capture and interpret data and store the data in cloud data repositories focusing on main areas of respiratory healthcare including pulse oximetry, pulmonary ventilation, air quality assessment, and activity tracking. Wearable respiratory devices reduce the workload of healthcare providers, improve the efficiencies of diagnostics, reduce costs incurred by patients in regular checkups and improve patients' comfort, shaping the anesthesia and respiratory devices market outlook.
