Some Key Highlights From the Report

- The candida bombicola segment accounted for a significant revenue share in 2021. It is the most widely used fungal strain for production of sophorolipids. The fungi are capable of producing the biosurfactant using two carbon sources and a nitrogen source and utilize waste products as raw materials, such as feedstock, animal oils, and waste cooking oils. This reduces environmental pollution as well as enables maintenance of a circular economy, which is expected to increase adoption of the strain in the coming years, and boost revenue growth of this segment.
- The FMCG industry segment accounted for a significant revenue share in 2021. Rising environmental concerns due to use of synthetic detergents and soaps and the steady transition toward organic detergents is a crucial factor driving revenue growth of this segment. Sophorolipids are used in soaps, detergents, as well as in body washes, shampoos, conditioners, and hair refreshers due to its favorable properties. The molecule is amphipathic, and exhibits anti-bacterial and anti-fungal properties, which is beneficial for consumers. This is increasing adoption of sophorolipid-based personal care products and supporting revenue growth of the FMCG industry.

The market in Europe is expected to register rapid CAGR during the forecast period. Robust presence of major companies in countries in this region is a major factor driving revenue growth of the market in this region. Publication of research initiatives related to beneficial properties of sophorolipids are increasing adoption of the biosurfactant in different sectors. Strategic collaborations between companies regarding sophorolipid production is another factor expected to contribute to revenue growth of the Europe sophorolipids market between 2022 and 2030.

The latest report is the most recent study that offers 360° coverage of the Sophorolipids industry that has been facing the brunt of the adverse economic impact of the COVID-19 outbreak since the beginning of this year.
