Drug Discovery Services: Overview

Discovery and characterization of the novel drug candidate for preclinical development are primarily dependent on innovation, research, and science. Drug discovery is the process of discovering and designing novel candidates for medication and therapy. The most common drug discovery methods are molecular designing, molecular manipulation, drug metabolites, random screening, and others. However, the discovery process is generally expensive and time-consuming. Drug discovery services are predominantly designed with the purpose of minimizing the costs and time required for the process.

Drug discovery services find extensive usage in forensic science, paternity testing, anthropology, and disaster victim identification. DNA analysis is a crucial element of this segment. Drug discovery services are an amalgamation of drug-target recognition, drug design, lead optimization, compound recognition, and drug discovery selection. The market for drug discovery services is expanding rapidly due to increased demand for analytical testing and clinical trials.
