The copolymerization of butadiene with acrylonitrile produces nitrile butadiene rubber (NBR), often known as Buna-N or nitrile rubber. The synthetic rubber nitrile butadiene rubber is a copolymer of acrylonitrile and butadiene. It has strong elongation qualities, exceptional to good compression set resistance, acceptable resilience, and tensile strength, but weak flame and steam resistance. It is most commonly used in applications where strong oil resistance is required, such as automobile seals, gaskets, and other objects that come into contact with hot oils. NBR is a good material for aviation applications since it can tolerate temperatures ranging from 40 to 108 degrees Celsius. Dashboards, brake pads, kick panels, and other components made of nitrile butadiene rubber are commonly utilized in the automobile and industrial industries. In these industries, it is referred to as the rubber labour. Its capacity to maintain various temperature levels is one of its many properties, making it helpful in aeronautical applications. The physical properties of nitrile butadiene rubber, such as hardness and rigidity, make it a suitable material for use in the nuclear sector.
