Noise-induced hearing loss is the second major cause of deafness after age-related reasons. Noise-induced hearing loss is widespread in industrial employees who are exposed to continuous dangerous levels of noise over an extended period of time. Mining and construction industries are examples of such sectors.

The constant loud noise harms the microscopic hairs in the ears, which are important for transmitting electrical signals to the brain. These hair cells cannot be regenerated or regrown, resulting in permanent hearing loss. Electronic and non-electronic hearing protection devices are available.

Electronic hearing protection devices are increasingly advanced and more expensive. When exposed to unsafe levels of noise, electronic hearing protection devices utilise a mix of electrical and structural components to decrease or cancel sounds.
