The picture archiving and communication system (PACS) channel includes features such as videos and other content on this key information technology product category that serves as the backbone of radiology and medical image sharing. PACS acts as a computer network for digitized radiological images and reports. It has moved away from standalone systems to enterprise imaging systems that integrate all departments that generate imaging and image related reports so they can be centralized in one location and integrated into over-arching electronic medical record (EMR). Its technologies include remote image viewing systems that allow images and reports that can be accessed anywhere with a web connection, advanced visualization to reformat, perform measurement quantifications, and archive storage, which focuses on use of
