A rubber tired gantry (RTG) crane, commonly known as a transtainer, is a portable device utilized in intermodal operations for grounding or stacking containers. It is mainly powered by electricity or diesel generator systems and can be commanded remotely. RTG cranes have rigid and stable steel structures that facilitate smooth movements and precise handling even at high speeds. These devices are also used to position pipelines, assemble heavy manufacturing components, and erect large and unbalanced arrangements. RTG cranes are created for space-saving container terminals to minimize downtime, enhance productivity, improve performance, extend flexibility, and reduce costs. As a result, these devices find widespread utilization across various sectors, such as construction, oil and gas, power, shipbuilding, etc.

Rubber Tired Gantry Crane Market Trends and Drivers:

The escalating number of trading activities via ships and cargo planes is primarily driving the rubber tired gantry crane market. Besides this, the launch of favorable policies by the government bodies for the development of port infrastructures and capacities is further augmenting the market growth.

Apart from this, the expansion of the Panama Canal has assisted in the shipping container traffic across countries, which is also catalyzing the global market. Moreover, the elevating industrialization and globalization levels, continuous technological advancements, and the flexible import-export taxation regimes are acting as significant growth-inducing factors.

Furthermore, the introduction of active load system (ALS) technology in these devices to enhance container stability and operational efficiency during the transportation is anticipated to bolster the rubber tired gantry crane market over the forecasted period.
