Restoring of fluid loss with circulatory fluids, rectification of electrolyte disturbances, substitution of hyperglycemia with insulin, improvement in the balance of acid base and management of simultaneous infection are some of the primary components of diabetic ketoacidosis treatment. However, factors such as significant side effects of the existing diabetic ketoacidosis drugs, dearth of skilled clinicians and limited facilities in less developed or low income countries, and stringent government regulations for drug development are expected to restrict the market growth during the forecast period.

Asia Pacific exhibits tremendous growth potential for growth in adoption of treatments associated with diabetic ketoacidosis owing to increasing prevalence of diabetes and due to favorable government funding for infrastructure development.
