Because pickup trucks can be classified as light commercial vehicles, insurance companies could closely scrutinize your driving record when you set out to insure yours.”

Recently, they shared information for pickup truck drivers not to be missed. Namely, how driving a pickup truck can affect insurance rates.

First, they explain that pickup trucks are often classified as light commercial vehicles:

“In Fargo, pickup trucks are often classified as light commercial vehicles. This means that they are subject to different rules and regulations than other types of vehicles. If you want to insure your pickup truck, you will need to purchase a commercial vehicle policy. These policies tend to cost more than standard auto insurance policies.

Whether or not your pickup truck is classified as a commercial vehicle or not can depend on many things, including the intended use of the vehicle, the size of the vehicle, and how many people it can seat.”

They also explain that pickup truck drivers' records will be closely scrutinized:

blemishes on your record, you can expect to pay higher rates.”

Finally, they explain that pickup truck drivers might need to purchase additional coverage:

“In some cases, you may be required to purchase additional coverage for your pickup truck. This is typically the case if you use your truck for business purposes. If you only use it for personal use, you may not need to purchase any additional coverage.”
