Rise in incidences of chronic diseases, loss of patent extensions of branded drugs, and the increased availability of advanced diagnostics is expected to boost the growth of biologics market. In addition, growth in technology for the production of biologics is projected to fuel the market growth. However, difficulty in manufacturing biologic drugs and the process involved in maintenance, which includes preventing from environmental contamination, maintaining refrigeration processes, and others hinder the market. The increase in demand for advanced diagnostics in treatment purposes and the loss of patent extensions of branded drugs provide opportunity for the growth of global biologics market.

The market is segmented based on product type, therapeutics, source of material, and geography. Based on product type, it is divided into monoclonal antibodies (MAbs), hormones, growth factors, fusion proteins, cytokines, therapeutic enzymes, blood factors and anticoagulants, vaccines, blood and blood products, allergenic extracts, human cells and tissues, proteins, gene therapies, cellular therapies, and xenotransplantation products. The market on the basis of therapeutics is classified into oncology, cardiovascular, immunological diseases, infectious diseases, and metabolic diseases.
