Declan Hahn elucidates on how social media has transformed the whole landscape of politics.

WASHINGTON, DC, UNITED STATES, August 9, 2022 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Declan Hahn, a Washington-based political consultant and strategist has just expressed his thoughts about how social media has changed the landscape of politics forever. This comes as no shock, although he did underline the benefits. In an earlier interview, he gave his thoughts about Twitter and how social media is a medium for candidates to not only tell their agendas but interact with them.

"In the old days, if you wanted to run for office or try to influence politics, you had to go out and meet people in person," he says. "You'd go door-to-door, and you'd have phone banks and face-to-face conversations with people who might not be willing to talk to a candidate if they were a Democrat or Republican. Now that's all changed," Hahn says. "We've got this massive internet presence that doesn't require any of that." He says social media has made it easier for people to be more connected than ever before, which means candidates can reach more people than ever before.

"Social media has changed the landscape of politics; It's no longer just about communicating with your base, it's about communicating with a much wider audience," added Declan Hahn.

Social media has played a significant role in political campaigns, as seen in the previous election. While the Internet has been used to spread ideas and influences for decades, it was only recently that it became a central part of campaign strategy.

While this new form of campaigning may seem like an example of how technology has changed politics, it actually represents how politics has changed since social media became popular. The ability to connect directly with voters through social media gives politicians a more direct line into their constituents' hearts and minds than ever before — which means they can formulate messages based on what people are saying online rather than having to wait until they get back home from work or school or wherever they spend most of their time these days.

Political consultants are always looking for ways to improve their clients' campaigns. The advent of social media has been a boon for politicians, who can now reach out directly to voters in an effort to win them over. Social media and politics have become a strange mix of friends, family, and enemies. It's not just about what you say, but how you say it, the tone of your voice, the way you dress, how attractive you are, and whether you have a pot belly or not.
