POCT Device Market Scenario

A point-of-care testing (POCT) diagnostic device is a device that is used to collect specific clinical data from patients in a clinical setting. As infection identification leads to decreased antibiotic intake, fewer laboratory tests for patients, and lower treatment costs, point-of-care testing (POCT) is rapidly emerging into a preferred test option. This is not only beneficial to patients, but it is also beneficial to hospitals, settings with restricted resources

One of the primary factors driving the expansion of the point-of-care testing (POCT) market is the increase in funding from various sources around the world. Increased demand for point-of-care tests due to divisions such as operating rooms, cath labs, ICU, emergency room, and neonatal intensive care units, among others, in order to deliver effective and speedy patient treatment accelerates the point-of-care testing (POCT) market expansion.

The surge in demand for home healthcare is driving manufacturers to develop user-friendly portable devices, and the introduction of smartphone-based healthcare solutions, digital technologies, and embedded vision-based solutions are all having an impact on the point-of-care testing (POCT) market. Furthermore, the growing importance of point-of-care diagnostics in environmental monitoring and public health, as well as the growing number of CLIA-waived point of care tests, technological advancements, and an increase in healthcare expenditure, all has a positive impact on the point-of-care testing (POCT) market.
