drivers

Growing demand for food preservation

Various food products, such as fruits, vegetables, meat, fish, culinary herbs and flavorings, ice cream and coffee, are preserved by freeze-drying technology. Freeze-dried foods do not need to be refrigerated or chemically preserved and can be quickly and easily reconstituted by simply adding water.

The use of freeze-dried food is increasing for astronauts and military personnel. Like conventional drying methods, they have significant drawbacks. For example, the high temperatures used can cause chemical or physical changes in food products, and their overall superiority is not comparable to that of freeze-dried nutritional products. Since these awards, the use of freeze-drying as a food preservation technique is cumulative throughout the world.

Loss of patent security for several biological products

One of the main contributors to the development of the lyophilization market in the healthcare industry is the biologics market.
