Dental Intraoral Scanners Market Scenario

Dental intraoral scanners (IOS) are dental devices used in dentistry to capture direct digital impressions. It works similarly to other scanning devices in that a laser source is projected onto the tooth site, which must be observed. Intraoral scanners are used to scan tooth arches, prepared teeth, and implant scan bodies. Intraoral scanners have overcome many of the challenges that traditional scanners that use impression plates and trays faced. When trays are used during scanning, they also cause minor discomfort to elderly patients. As a result, patients prefer more convenient and comfortable 3D digitalization impressions. With the technological advancements, recent intraoral scanners can scan the entire arch of teeth in less than 3 minutes.

Drivers:

Increase in Elderly Population

Globally, the elderly population is growing at an exponential rate, leading to an increase in diseases such as edentulism and tooth loss or decay. According to the United States Census Bureau, the number of people aged 65 and up is expected to reach 92.0 million by 2060. Because they are prone to oral health disorders and conditions, the market for intraoral scanners grows in tandem with the ageing population.

Higher Demand of Hospitals

Hospitals are in high demand in recent years, owing to patients' increasing preference for technologically advanced and precise intraoral scanning techniques, rising per-capita income of the population, and increasing incidence of teeth malfunctioning and other dental disorders. Hospitals are expected to maintain their dominance due to improvements in hospital infrastructure, an increase in the number of multispecialty hospitals, and favourable hospital reimbursement policies.

Opportunities:

Rising Incidence of Dental Restorative Procedures

Rising number of dental restorative procedures across the globe and extraordinary result of intraoral scanners which aids in the detection of intraoral soft-tissue malfunctions are the major factors expected to drive the intraoral scanners market during the forecast period.

Increasing Dental Problems

According to the WHO, nearly 3.5 billion people were affected by oral diseases, with over 530 million children suffering from caries in their primary teeth. With the introduction of intraoral scanners into the dental device market, the dental practise landscape has been modernised.
